

The penguins decided to leave the North Pole – they'd had enough of the polar bears and their nasty tricks. The penguins dived into the sea and swam away toward the South Pole. Penguin Small watched them, too afraid to jump into the water.

He put his head under his wing and cried, then waddled along the water's edge, feeling sad. Penguin Small bumped into a snowman who had only been made that morning and was just learning to speak.

The polar bears were coming. Penguin Small climbed up the snowman, rubbed out the snowman's mouth and hid in his hat.

The polar bears were angry and demanded to know where all the penguins had gone. They jumped up and down in a bad mood, which made the snow crack. The snowman and Penguin Small floated away from the bears on their own little iceberg.

They travelled away from the North Pole. Penguin Small re-drew the snowman's mouth and taught him how to speak. It got much warmer, and they found an island full of amazing creatures.

The snowman decided to live on the island, but Penguin Small missed his friends. The snowman gave the penguin his hat as a boat, and he floated away towards the South Pole.

Penguin Small got caught in a storm and was tossed high in the air and round and round in the sea. He got washed up on a blue island, which turned out to be a big blue whale.

The whale blew out water, helping Penguin Small to learn how to fly. The two travelled together until Penguin Small arrived at the South Pole and found his friends and his new home.
